At the Woman's Club.
 When you have heard Dr. J. C. Metcalf once you want to hear him again. It is what Miss Jane Rutherford said last night in her presentation of the speaker to the members of the Woman's Club, and, indeed, his lectures there this winter have been events to be remembered with pleasure. It is of unusual interest and brilliancy, his subtle and pervading humor, and a host of other charms that so delight Dr. Metcalf's audience whatever it is, he molds all minds that he touches into the trend of his own thought and feelings.

He talked to the club last evening about "Shelley, the Man and Theorist." Mad Shelley—the kind of mad that is beautiful and ineffectual angel—what ever time you will, Dr. Metcalf said that one could not let him alone. He has been dead almost 100 years and is almost as far removed from the actual world of ours as it is possible for a man to be and yet there is no life that has not at some time felt the impulse of idealism that Shelley stood for. He belongs to those men that naturally keep their eyes on the future, and in a time of revolution when all Europe was in a turmoil, he must have imbibed all that tumult in his blood and he pre-eminently lacked restraint.

In an address "once upon a time" fashion the speaker narrated the familiar story of Shelley's life and surroundings, all about his friendships, the striking incidents of his college years—those impractical Oxford days—what his beautiful mother looked like and the things his father thought— all sketched briefly and touched here and there with intimate personal thoughts of Dr. Metcalf. He spoke not primarily of the poet, but of the man and some of his theories—this golden-haired boy, this dreamer of immortal dreams.

What most impresses a reader of Shelley is his passionate love of beauty and truth. He passionately loved liberty, in the abstract, of course, since there is nothing concrete about Shelley and hated intolerance. He was like a child in his feelings, and whatever was bad was very bad and whatever was good was very good. By his idealism he inspired about 100 years ago the movement of religious, superstition and mistakes of religion, and the weaknesses of the structured whole. He was just a creature of winds and dreams, and there was nothing tangible about him. His poetry was all misty with rainbow tints, and hazy in its delicate tracery of thought and purpose. He seemed possessed with a desire to free the world, and his "Declaration of Rights" is a most remarkable piece of literature, resembling in many points the Declaration of Independence, written by Jefferson. Considerable of a philanthropist, one finds him giving large sums to the poor, relieving the sick and paying the debts of impecunious friends. Another point was his unworldliness.

Dr. Metcalf concluded his lecture with a story of his "Prometheus Unbound" with all its pantheistic and golden dreams, and a reading from the Declaration of Rights. He asked that one think of this man—this ethereal being—loving soul—as a prophet of a new social order.

Dr. John Dunn then gave what he termed another American touch to the life of the man Shelley, in explaining very delightfully the significance of Shelley's poetry, which is a most property and was loaned to the club for this occasion. He gave a short history of the picture, which, by the way, has never been printed, painted by the artist, and a portrait of Lord Byron.

PREMIER IS VICTOR IN SERIES OF DUELS

President of Chamber of Deputies Forced to Fight for His Rulings.

BY LA MARQUISE DE FONTENAY.
 IMAGINE Champ Clark, the present speaker of Congress, or his predecessor the Hon. Joe Cannon, stripped to the waist, backing away with a cavalry sabre at a political adversary in similar deshabille, surrounded by a ring of members of the upper and lower house of the national legislature, as well as by seconds, surgeons, ambulance bearers, and all the other appurtenances of a serious sanguinary duel at Washington, D. C.

It is in this guise that Count Stephen Tisza, former Hungarian Premier, and now Speaker and President of the Chamber of Deputies at Budapest, has been selected to fight a whole series of duels, from all of which he has emerged the victor, although his adversaries were men about half his age, and he himself was further handicapped by a lameness which causes him to limp, and by a shortness of sight that compels him to wear big horn-rimmed spectacles, suggestive of the Oriental pundit and Chinese scholar, which Woodrow Wilson's inventor, George Harvey, has set the fashion in this country, giving them his name.

The duels of Count Tisza originated with his rulings as, with the exception of the Ottoman House of Representatives at Constantinople, the most turbulent parliament in the Old World. To such an extent did this turbulence last year as to render legislation impossible. Count Tisza, who is perhaps the ablest statesman in Hungary, was elected to the office of President for the purpose of putting a stop to the methods of violence and disorder which were rendering the Hungarian Parliament an object of reproach both at home and abroad. The count fulfilled the task for which he had been selected, and his rulings, which have been characterized by firmness and vigor. In fact, he has shown no toleration for disturbance.

Every attempt has been made to intimidate him, but without avail, and when a legislator beside himself with passion at the strict rulings of the Speaker, discharged his revolver at him during one of the sessions, the bullets narrowly missing their mark, and the man was tried for attempted murder, he was acquitted by the jury, and his act was publicly, not only defended, but even commended by leading members of the opposition in Parliament, some of them statesmen who had formerly held office as Cabinet ministers.

When that failed to move Count Tisza, his political adversaries attempted a different maneuver, viz., an object of rendering his position as Speaker untenable. They invoked the aid of those of their number who belong to the principal club at Pesth, which, bearing the name of the National Casino, is practically restricted to the old aristocracy and as such is the most powerful factor in the social life of the Hungarian capital. The anti-Tisza members thereof were persuaded to institute a sort of boycott against him, and to refuse to respond to his greetings, or to shake hands with him.

Now all over the Continent, with the exception of Switzerland, there are among men of birth and breeding but few who are not ready to accept of this kind; that is to say, a challenge to fight a duel, preceded by a blow in the face, or without any further preliminaries. For a man to refrain from thus demanding satisfaction is to commit a grave infraction of the laws of honor, and to condemn himself to an ostracism necessitating his withdrawal from all his clubs, his surrender of his office, and his expulsion from every form of social life.

Accordingly, when Count Tisza one evening, entering the smoking-room of the club, found Count Michael Karolyi, Count Aladar Szechenyi, and the Marquis Pallavicini in conversation with another, and called out to them a friendly "Good evening," both Pallavicini and Szechenyi acknowledged his salutation, but Karolyi refrained from doing so. Instead, he rose from his seat, and turned his back deliberately on Tisza. The latter immediately strode up to him, and using the familiar pronoun of "thou," exclaimed: "Michael, I said good evening to you just now, and am astonished not to receive any acknowledgment." Whereupon Karolyi replied: "After what has taken place, it is surely superfluous that we should waste any time in chatting with one another." Within half an hour Tisza's second, had conveyed a challenge to Karolyi. On the following day an encounter took place between the two in one of the principal fencing schools of the city. There were no less than thirty-two rounds, during the course of which Tisza took the offensive throughout, repeatedly wounding Karolyi, cutting open his head, and slashing him about the arm and body, and he was placed completely hors de combat. On the following day Tisza received a letter from Count Aladar Szechenyi, expressing his regret at having responded to his (Tisza's) greeting two evenings before, and stating that he had done so inadvertently. Another duel followed within twenty-four hours, and here, too, after a strenuous encounter, Tisza placed his adversary, his junior by more than twenty years, completely hors de combat.

A third duel was about to take place, and there were prospects of others following, when the governing board of the club got together and, severely condemning the practice of introducing ing more political quarrels into social life, declared that Count Tisza had gallantly safeguarded his honor, what was a relief in the eyes of the club from the ethical necessity of fighting any one else who declined to respond to his greeting, and that consequently any member of the club who under the circumstances rendered himself guilty of a piece of discourtesy of this kind towards Tisza would subject himself to being severely disciplined by the club.

Tisza put an end to the boycotting movement against Tisza, whose pluck, vigor and skill with his sabre caused a revulsion of public sentiment in his favor.

Tisza fought several successful duels about ten years ago, one notably with Stephen Rakovsky. In 1898 Baron Hanffy, the then Premier, fought a duel with one of the parliamentary leaders, Ferdinand Horansky, who had called him a liar. In 1897 Count Cassirer Baden, while Premier, had a duel with Deputy Wolff and was wounded, but not dangerously, by the Premier's sword. Minister of the coalition Cabinet, fought a duel with Countess Polonyi, and General Baron Fejervary, one of the bravest veterans of Emperor Francis Joseph's army, and one of the only surviving half-dozen Knights of the Order of Maria Theresa, was obliged to fight a duel with Countess Polonyi, Minister of War and when Premier, the door of the only surviving half-dozen Knights of the Order of Maria Theresa, was obliged to fight a number of duels at Pesth, both when Minister of War and when Premier. One of these encounters, despite his advanced age he was considerably over seventy at the time, he worsted his adversary, on one occasion soundly knocking him down, and thus saving himself from a dangerous wound to the man's life was despatched of for a time.

The other day, on the election of Sunday night the cat was heard to sneeze and cough. For two hours she did much damage, tearing around the house. Later she settled down, would eat nothing and was apparently dying.

Dr. Zimmerman, a veterinarian, was called to-day, decided to operate, etherized the cat and from an incision in the neck drew forth a seven-inch hatpin, which had been swallowed headfirst. The cat is now recovering.

The scheme was the idea of the American commander. Sentries had been stationed 300 yards inside the entanglements, and when the Moros attempted a night attack they rattled the tin cans in the underbrush, arousing the American soldiers in time to check the stealthy assault.

Raymond Poincare to the presidency of the French republic, the very thing that he did was to send a challenge to fight a duel to ex-Premier Clemenceau. Fortunately, friends intervened, and an encounter between these two men, one white-haired, the other extremely gray, was averted.

Yet in France, as in Hungary and everywhere else on the Continent, dueling is strictly forbidden under the most drastic penalties by the law of the land, and needless to say, also by the laws of the various churches. All these laws, ecclesiastical as well as temporal, are, however, of no avail in the face of the unwritten and far more imperative laws of the social code, and here it is possible to expect people not to give the preference to the latter, when they find the greatest authorities on the state, those entrusted with the execution of the laws, such as the Premier, Cabinet ministers, and even Presidents of republics, setting an example of disregard, which is approved by royalty, since monarchs always deprive officers, military and civil, of their commissions if they refuse to fight duels.
